

Lab Manager in the Crockett Lab, Princeton University

The Crockett Lab at Princeton University is considering applications for a full-time Lab Manager position to begin in summer/fall 2022 (start date flexible). The position will be for one year with a possibility of renewal. We are looking for applicants interested in computational approaches to studying social cognition. Some of our current projects are investigating how narratives influence moral judgment and decision-making; how social media impacts moral emotions and political behavior; how identity characteristics like gender become moralized; and how social norms can help or hinder authentic self-discovery and expression. We use a variety of methods in our research, including behavioral experiments in the lab and online, field studies, computational modeling, brain imaging, machine learning, and natural language processing. We are especially interested in bridging quantitative and qualitative methods for understanding human experience and transformation.

For more information about the position and application instructions, see here:
